5 Youths Remanded On Clapham Murder Charge

"Evening News" Reporter

FIVE youths, one of them aged 15 and another 16, were again remanded at South Western Court to-day charged with killing another youth.

They were accused of being concerned together in the murder of John Ernest Beckley, aged 17, of Amelia-street, Walworth, at Clapham Common on July 2.

Counsel for one of the boys, 16-year-old Terence David Woodman, street trader of St. Luke's-avenue, Clapham, made a plea that he should be sent to a remand home and not to Brixton Prison during the remand period. The magistrate refused.

The other youths were: Ronald Coleman, aged 15, shop assistant of Chessington House, Union-road Clapham; Terence Newlyn House, East Hill Estate, Wandsworth, and Michael John Davies, aged 20, labourer, Turret-grove, Clapham.

Coleman and Woodman sat with their fathers in front of the dock.

PLEA For Woodman

Mr. R. J. Harvey, counsel for Woodman, asked if he could call Woodman's headmaster to give some evidence "in order that you might direct that he should not go to Brixton but to a remand home. The headmaster will say that Woodman was very well behaved straightforward and trustworthy."

Mr. Patrick Scott, headmaster of Santley-road Secondary School, said that Woodman's behaviour at school was unexceptionable and he was never in serious trouble. He left last Easter.

Mr. William Cox, road transport services driver, of St. Luke's-avenue, Clapham, said he lived next door to Woodman and had known him since 1946, when he was nine. He was a good-mannered boy, cheerful and obedient.

Mr. Edward Henry Brown, a bus conductor, of St. Luke's-avenue, Clapham, said he thought Woodman was a very reserved boy.

The magistrate told Woodman's counsel: "What I have to decide is not what his character was, but what it is. I think I am bound to rely upon Mr. Davies."

A post-mortem examination will be held to-day on the body of 17-month-old Patricia Rose Cotterell, of Elizabeth-way, Rogers-lane, Stoke Poges, Bucks., who was found dead lying upside down in an oil barrel in the garden of a neighbour on Saturday evening. There was three inches of water in the barrel.

NO POLITICS IN OUR WORK: UNION CHIEF

"Evening News" Industrial Correspondent

SPEAKING to 800 delegates representing 1,320,000 trade unionists, Mr. Edgar E. Fryer, chairman of the Transport and General Workers Union, biggest trade union in the country, told the Southsea conference to-day that "the trade unions have a continuing job of work to do, regardless of the colour of the Government of the day."

Mr. Fryer said controversy and misunderstanding had developed over the position of the trade unions under a Tory Government.

No Disloyalty

There was no question of abandoning any of the principles which so closely bound them to the Labour Party, but they must be realistic in their approach to the problems vitally affecting the lives of their members.

"The political relationship within our movement," declared Mr. Fryer "will never, I suggest, be affected by any disloyalty on the part of the trade unions.

"On the other hand we cannot allow political expediency to determine our action in the economic and industrial field."

POLICE ARREST MAN ABOARD LINER

Robert Michael Parkins, aged 34, unemployed, of no fixed address, was remanded in custody at Plymouth to-day, charged with bigamously marrying Margaret Wright Gladdish, of the Children's Hospital, Great Ormond-street.

100 Passengers and Crew Taken Ill in the Queen Mary

"Evening News" Reporter

ABOUT 100 cases of a mild form of stomach trouble, believed due to humidity caused by the Gulf Stream, were reported among the passengers and crew in the liner Queen Mary on her voyage from New York which ended at Southampton to-day.

The liner left New York on July 7 and the trouble started on the next day. There were no hospital cases.

A Cunard spokesman said the liner's water supply was tested and found to be pure.

The Queen Mary had nearly 3,000 passengers and crew on board.

LACK OF GINGER

MOST girls with red hair are fairly definite in their ways. They know what they want. They speak to the point. And if th are contradict a certain fire comes into their eyes But now and then you come upon a red-haired girl whose manner is vague, whose words are wandering and whose progress through life resembles that of a lost soul trying to find a path in a mist. Such a girl was Maureen of the blazing curls and the bewildered demeanour. She fumbled up the steps to the dock of the Bow-street court, blinked round her with bright, blue and baffled eyes, and said to the Chief Magistrate of all London, Sir Laurence Dunne, "They keep on persecuting me, sir, they persecute me all the time."

❖ ❖ ❖

SIR LAURENCE studied Maureen in a kindly but leonine fashion, and he said gently, "H'm?"

"Everywhere I go, sir."

"But last night——"

"They won't leave me alone."

"H'm—quite," said Sir Laurence. "I'll hear all about that later on, of course. But at the moment you are charged with using insulting behaviour in the street last night."

Maureen seemed to feel the persecution closing in on her again, even within those solid legal walls. "I may have done it, sir," she said, her tone the tone of a red-headed girl in distress, "but I couldn't help it. It started till all started in Manchester, where I had all the trouble with the landlord, and even my fur coat——"

"Yes," said Sir Laurence, all understanding. "I gather you're a bit doubtful about the charge, and so I shall enter a plea of Not Guilty, sit down and listen to the evidence, will you?"

❖ ❖ ❖

SO Maureen sat down in a bright, forlorn posture behind the bars, and the constable in the witness-box told how he had seen her smiling vaguely at men on the pavement, much, of course, to the men's annoyance. "I arrested her using insulting behaviour, sir," ended the constable, "and in answer to the charge she made no reply."

"How many men did she annoy?"

"Four altogether, sir."

"They showed annoyance?"

"Distinctly, sir."

"In what way?"

"They brushed her aside."

Sir Laurence nodded, for men do not brush girls aside unless they are annoyed with them, and he turned to the red hair in the dock, and he said, "Any questions?"

❖ ❖ ❖

MAUREEN rose uncertainly, but when she spoke it was as though the accumulated words of months were pouring in a disordered stream through her lips. "I started when I had the argument with the landlord in Manchester, sir," she said, "and he played a lot of dirty tricks on me, and of course I accused him, and I suppose I really shouldn't have done it, but ever since then I've been persecuted everywhere. They persecuted me in Manchester, and they chased me in Liverpool, and they're still after me even in London, and——"

"Yes," said Sir Laurence patiently. "But tell me—who exactly is chasing you?"

"The population, sir."

"You mean everybody?"

"The whole population."

"Why do they do that?"

Maureen made a despairing gesture. "I don't know," she confessed. "All I know is that it started in Manchester."

❖ ❖ ❖

STILL Sir Laurence sought for the secret of the red-haired girl. "Have you had an accident that everybody in London is against you?"

"Of course," said Maureen.

"I see," said Sir Laurence.

"I'm telling the truth," pleaded Maureen. "Please believe I'm telling the truth. I don't know why the people should be against me, because they can't know much about what happened in Manchester but they won't let me alone, and it's so wrong, sir, it's so wrong. Many days I haven't had anywhere to stay, and many days I've had no food to eat. What can I do, sir? What can I do?"

Sir Laurence pondered this problem—just another of the problems that turn magistrates' hair white. And he did what many magistrates have done: he consulted the woman missionary in court. "What would you had to talk with this girl?" he asked. "Do you know what's behind all this?"

❖ ❖ ❖

THE woman missionary, laden with the secrets of girls' hearts, rose understandingly. "Well, sir," she said to Sir Laurence, "I've had a long talk with this girl, and she really does have an idea that people are persecuting her, though it isn't quite clear why, except that there was some sort of disagreement with her landlord in Manchester. I feel quite sorry for her, and I'd like to find her a job, if——and the woman missionary chose the tactful phrase "in our efforts to recommend mercy—" you take a certain course."

"Excellent," agreed Sir Laurence, and he turned back to Maureen. "Would you like to get a job, if we can find a job for you?"

"Of course," sighed Maureen. "What can you do?"

"Anything."

"Good," said Sir Laurence.

Maureen's air was that of a girl who had glimpsed a distant light. "All I want is a job, sir," she said with a sudden eagerness. "I can't sleep because I haven't any peace of mind. Even my fur coat has gone."

❖ ❖ ❖

"WELL, well," said Sir Laurence encouragingly. "It looks as if we might be able to help. But you really must not go on wandering about the streets, you know, or you'll get into really serious trouble."

"It's all the truth, sir."

"Yes, yes, I know."

"My fur coat——"

"Go away now," said Sir Laurence, and arrange it all with that lady over there, and please try to get these ideas out of your head, because ideas like that won't make you any happier."—J.A.J.

SUSPENSE, DRAMA—THIS IS THE RIGHT STUFF FOR TV

"ANASTASIA" is one of those all-too-rare plays which, produced as it was last night, make for almost perfect television viewing.

It is the story of a syndicate of white Russian refugees in Berlin who have fraudulently collected money from sympathisers on the pretext that they have found alive the daughter of the Czar. Then they have to produce her.

It has suspense, drama, intrigue and emotional moments which give actresses like Mary Kerridge and Helen Haye the chance to act without having to shout at a gallery.

It is not difficult to guess well before halfway who "Anastasia" really is, but author Marcelle-Maurette's climax is unpredictable. I will not spoil it for viewers who missed it last night and will be seeing it on Thursday.

Why? "the new family game, had little interest. At best it raised an occasional smile.

Last night's viewing ended with 15 minutes of John Gavall, who played a gentler and sang delightfully, but wasted too much time trying to convince non-players that they ought to have a guitar around the house.—R.H.

* * *

FOR the last in the series of portraits of the lives of outstanding people in the entertainment world to-night the B.B.C. has chosen Andre Charlot.

Charlot, who was born in France and later took British nationality, staged many great shows and discovered many stars. Beatrice Lillie, Jessie Matthews and Jack Hulbert are all appearing in to-night's Light programme half-hour close-up of Charlot's 50 years in show business.

Graham Greene's psychological thriller, "Brighton Rock," adapted for broadcasting by Evelyn Russell, will be on the Home Service at 9.15.

Richard Attenborough's film part of "Pinkie" will be played by Jimmy Thompson.
